Nurses Notes

Are you really healthier than a 100-year-old?

Looking at the outcome of the seventh-annual "United HealthCare 100@100 Survey" report, may cause baby boomers to ask themselves a rather curious question: "Am I healthier than a Centenarian?" This survey took a look at the habits, preferences, and lifestyles of 100 centenarians (people age 100 and older) and measured them against 300 baby boomers (aged 50-55) to pinpoint the differences and similarities between each group. Here is what they found by asking a few questions:

5. What do you do for exercise?

Both age groups reported that physical health was the most important, yet most difficult, aspect of health to maintain as a person gets older. How do the oldest elders work out? Many cited walking (44 percent) and engaging in muscle strengthening exercises (41 percent) as their go-to methods of staying in shape. One curious finding in the realm of physical fitness was that more centenarians than boomers said that they supplemented their work-out regimes with mind/body/spirit activities such as Yoga, or Tai chi.

6. Do you regularly communicate with friends and family?

The same number (89 percent) of boomers and centenarians claimed that they engage in regular communication and with their family and friends, lending further credence to the connection between a strong social support group and good health.
